WHEELING, W. VA., JULY 29, 1885.

State Journal has been discovering West Virginia, He came into the State on a free trip with some business men, ran through the Kanawha Valley to White Sulphur Springs, and there indulged in some critical remarks on his discovery. Here, for example, is the way the Columbus philosopher blights our hopes and cu s short a promising career:

bus philosopher blights our hopes and cu s short a promising career:

West Virginia deserves its reputation of being the most picturesque yet barren and worthless btate upon the footstool. What it was made for, except to delight the eye, the most astute searcher after truth has been unable to determine. As an agricultural State it is a shining failure. My agricultural eye detected that at a glance—after an old farmer on the train had pointed it out to me. The land all stands on end, and bare, sterile rock, untillable mountains and ravines, go to make up West Virginia. I saw some weak kneed corn, perhaps a foot high, that stood as an apology for its existence, standing in the thin surface that owers the rocks, that will never be fit for anything more than fodder, while the wheat that had been cut, cut just as sorry a figure. The shocks were no bigger than the bill of your wife's spring hat, and the grain and tares so mixed that it would have required the legal accumen of a Columbus police court lawyer to separate them. I was told that the wheat was cut with a case knife in this country, and an almost prepared to belief that it was also sown with a shotgun.

I imagine that if Blaine had made a tour of the State before the October election he would never have cherished the thought of dislocating the goinal column of the would never hat the spinal column of the solid South by defeating "Windy" Wilson for Governor. Republican voters do not grow in that kind of country. This is "very fine writin", to be sure, and one naturally longs to know how a iournalist from an adjoining State has found time from his routine duties to cram himself with so large and well assorted a stock of rampant ignorance. He dashes through a rich valley in the southern end of the State, mistakes that for the whole State and knows nothing of the wealth that fills the enclosing hills and the country beyond. He is passing over land that yields its owners $500 an acre in coal royalties; is within easy reach of splendid ests and grazing lands, and realizes only that corn and wheat are not luxuriant on these rugged mountain sides.

If he had had time and ordinary intelligence he might have found in West Virginia vast stretches of fine agricultural land under high cultivation, tilled by a people as industrious and intelligent as those on his own side of the Ohio river. If he had read up a little on his theme he would have found that West Virginia, far from being the "most barren and worthless State upon the footstool" is perhaps une qualled in richness of resource by any equal extent of territory. If he had looked for enough into his subject he would have learned that the country has here its great timber preserve, in which abound ard woods of great value.

If he had written to Washington he would have learned that the estimated value of the coal of West Virginia, at an fourth of the usual price-would pay the national debt twice over. He could easily have ascertained that over vast areas the blue grass appears as soon as the timber has been removed, making as fine grazing land as there is in the country.

Mr. Blaine, who knows well the resources of West Virginia, could have told him all these things and doubtless would have taken pleasure in doing a little missionary service of this kind. Among other things Mr. Blaine would probably have suggested to the Columbus voyager to take down his geography and his political hand-book, see through what counties he had passed and note carefully the very great growth of the Republican vote

These things might have consumed some time and caused some trouble. Be sides, we now and then find a man who prefers to make an ass of himself and delights to appear in public with his ears flapping. Providence has been so good to West Virginia that she can stand the jibes of the smart alecks who see no wealth where there are no brown-ston fronts.

is a very sensible suggestion: The old plan of sending a man a newspaper for a few months, and then abruptly stopping it when the election is over, has aroused a feeling of contempt for the ante-election document. That document is always in danger of a cold reception, because, when it arrives, the recipient has become a partisan. Do the protectionist not see the wisdom of doing this work when it can be done with good results.

A good newspaper sent regularly for a

A good newspaper sent regularly for a few months before election is infinitely better than nothing. It is even better to send a single copy than none at all, for the saving grace may be in that very copy. A newspaper is better than the literature which comes under the head of "docu-ments," for it has a news value and contains miscellaneous matter which makes it welcome to the woman of the family. Any man of family knows that if "the women folks" like a newspaper and it can be had without cost, that newspaper will not be refused. To make missionary labor of this kind count the newspaper ought to be sent for a year preceding the election, that its face may become familiar and its visits be looked forward to with pleasure. A well conducted newspaper can make itself acceptable to men the furthest removed from it in political thought. They will be for that something, and unconsciously be Arrive at Solitan at 2,30 r. of the many disadvantages under PONGEE which the press labors is its inability to avail itself of the many suggestions kindly placed at its disposal by its critics. The Coats and Vests! avail itself of the many suggestions. The criticisms are often just, it is true, but they are oftener upjust, and not infrequently quite as much directed against human nature in general as against editorial nature in particular. That there is too much sensationalism in the press to-day is too true. That the term "news" means something besides crimes and accidents is conceided by every respectable newspaper and by many that do not come up to the critics' standard of respectability. Great care is taken to publish the latest news of the artistic, literary and scientific world. Every paper of influence has its department of criticism. The press reflects the public tasts, which is far more comprehensive and far more exacting than it was even ten years ago. It is not to be disputed that many papers give undite prominence to criminal matters. Details not at all essential to a correct understanding of an occurrence are printed to make the matter lively; the dish is seasoned to tickle palates wearfed by previous moscules! But we maintain that the blood-curdling school of journalism is going the way of the Estanswill methods, which once seemed bound to dominate the press utterances of the country.

COMMISSIONER'S NOTICE. curding senon of judinasa is going the way of the Estanswill methods, which once seemed bound to dominate the press utterances of the country.

A recent critic, Rev. M. J. Savage, in the North American Review, sets up a number of straw effigies representing the vices of journalism as they appear to him, and gets a good deal of exercise in pushing them over. He then moralizes over their remains, and delivers himself of utterances to the full as sensational as anything preceded by "scare heads," and apparently designed to catch the attention of the reader. As Mr. Savage says a good deal about newspapers, it would be remarkable if he did not say something true. With his condemnation of the raw-head-and-body-hones style of writing most newspaper men will agree, but with many of his statements every newspaper man of experience will take issue. Washington correspondents do not make or unmake the reputation of men in public life. Very few men are wilten up or down. No amount of puffery will enable an incompetent man to hold a high position with distinction. No virulence of attack will break down a man in whom the people have confidence. Well deserved praise, the meed of just deserts, is one thing, puffery is another. Just censure tells, but unjust recoils on the assailant. Occasionally an individual reporter may evolve a sermon from his inner consclousness instead of reporting a discourse actually delivered. Reporters, as a class, do not make up a column or so, and eadlie it on to astonished divines. The manufacture of false reports is not voted a smart thing to do in decent offices. Is the existence of a spirit of cynical pessimism in this country due to "the method that the newspapers take for reporting crimes?" We doubt it. We have heard it attributed sometimes to the worldliness of the clergy, and their apparent lack of

We have heard it attributed sometimes to the worldliness of the clergy, and their apparent lack of religious belief. If pessimism is due to newspaper publications, why does it take such a firm hold on countries where the only press permitted is largely official, Russia and Germany for instance?
